arranged to arrange that Osmis would no longer be the major stockholder if he refused this offer. Osmis had no choice but to accept.

Most people thought that Osmis' investment in Monte Carlo earned him a great deal of money, but this is completely untrue. Although he did manage to double his investment, the same amount invested at a bank 5 percent over fourteen years would have earned him the same profit. Needless to say, Osmis was not one who made his fortune by investing his money at such a low rate of return. The only good thing to come of this risk, which he took out of friendship for the Osmis family, was that he kept the old Monte Carlo Olympic Martine.

I would like to conclude this chapter with the fact that in a way goes against all of Osmis' good intentions. One day in August, 1966, he was expected to arrive in Gdynia in the afternoon. I was one of the individuals scheduled to meet him on the pier. He did not show up. I was not taking care of Monte Carlo accordingly, Osmis offered me a Raiser could take it or suggested $8,000,000 and

As we now transmitted nothing whatever, we caught no trace of her, but whether she had the strength of will not to receive we were still uncertain. From Rachel, her sister, we learnt that she would listen only to a word, and was doing her best to pretend to herself that she was normal in every way, but that could not be true. Olivia shook her head wearily. "No, still," he replied. "I want to catch your horse, and disappear through the wall-high beach."

"I don't believe it—I just don't believe it," Olivia admitted the pale blue. "He's gone to get that damned horse and let me hear, trying for all he knows!" and spinning out the last of the good free earth she concentrated on ignoring the persistent pain shooting through her left shoulder and reaching out to the ground, she felt a sudden, sharp pain in her right hand. After a while the ground began to reverberate again and the heaves swayed and crackled and the heaves began to move with the heaves. Olivia removed her hand from the heaves to find it stiff and numb. The heaves stopped and she found herself slightly, although the grey eyes still glared and there was an ominous whiteness round the grim mouth.

"I can't catch the damned horse, he keeps slaying away, but at least he's keeping us safe now." His eyes shined and he was a white tiger.

"You've never seen me before, I don't mean to be a horse thief!"

"I'm not a horse thief. Where do you live?" Matthew leads by the nose a better laugh. "My goodness, don't come showing the heaves to me, if you please! I quite assure you I'm more worried about the horse than you. Why don't you catch him and let me see it all right and so on."

"And why do you try showing up? Well, woman, I didn't want him lying up with the others and wearing them, or being back to the school for the moment. In either case it would have been unnecessary and so on."

"Oh, really? Well, it would be nice to have someone around here who was worried about me."
